Long-term care - a growing need and shrinking options

Employees need options to help manage the need for long-term care insurance. Today, the need for care is growing, but there are fewer and fewer long-term care insurance options. Many long-term care insurers have left the market and many of those that do still offer protection have had to increase premiums.

As a result, many employers are turning to a hybrid life insurance and long-term care (LTC) product to protect employees with a two-in-one benefit.

Today's challenge

Rising costs

Premiums on similar stand-alone long-term care policies have increased by 42 percent since 2015.¹

Shrinking options

While there were more than 100 companies selling LTCI at the turn of the 21st century, today fewer than a dozen sell a meaningful number of policies.²

The dangers for employees

Increased need and reduced coverage options mean that employees may be at risk for paying their own costs for long term care - which can be substantial. That's where a life and long-term care product comes in to be a viable alternative.

$51,600

The median annual cost for a stay in an assisted living facility is $51,600.⁴

Employees turning to a life and long-term care solution of consumers say they are at least "somewhat likely" to buy a combination life and long-term care product.⁵

58%

15%

52% of consumers think they need LTC coverage, but only 15% have it.⁵

A survey found that LTC protection has the highest "need gap" of any voluntary product.⁶

Impact in the workplace

It's not just employees that are affected by care, employers are coping with it in their workforce and the effects can be dramatic. A life insurance and long-term care product can head this problem off for future generations while boosting employee loyalty by offering protection employees want.
